Technical Reflection

The default layout of the page was plain, unstructured, and has weak call-to-action. With this, we planned to improve the layout problem by using a Flexbox and adding aesthetical features to make the page more enticing. Flexbox was a practical choice since it provides an efficient one-dimensional layout page and is simple to implement for beginners. Through this, the page became more consistent, appealing, and efficient to the users.

Spacing had the most impact in the layout, allowing users to scan faster since certain elements will stand out naturally. Increasing the font size and making it bold gives more emphasis on the text, while using a modern font makes the website not feel outdated. We also emphasized the price by using a different color font that also guides the attention of the users.

Our button styling and hover effect communicates clickability. Its button-like shape, readable text, and hover transition with color shifts signal interactivity. If the CTA were less visually distinct, the user would require more cognitive effort to navigate.

At the mobile breakpoint, the layout of the image and text differs when the width of the screen changes. With the help of Flexbox, we can ensure that the layout doesn't look messy, will fit the mobile view, and will remain the same because we used a Flexbox with vertical stacking. This then allows the layout to cater more products since it will simply extend the vertical list and will not disrupt the layout structure.

Business Reflection

Our design focused on faster scanning of the page and more clicks. Users will be able to process messages efficiently by highlighting the needed action areas, specifically the button and price. In connection with this, this would also translate to more clicks from the users since we have the emphasis to the purchase button with the effects and layout we designed it with.

If the Add-To-Cart rate doesn't improve after our redesign, we would need to revisit the visual presentation because aesthetics strongly influence purchase decisions, especially in the clothing industry. The same goes with the web page, if they find it attractive, while still having the efficient and effective functionality, it will also affect the conversion rate.
